

Crime

Have you ever thought what makes some people commit a crime and turn into criminals? Most offenders begin with a tiny offence which usually remains unpunished so they think they will never get caught. Being aware of illegal intentions they don't hesitate and make a conscious decision in order to reach their goal. Most criminals are eager to get rid of their everyday problems but instead they find themselves more involved in misdemeanours. Once a person steps into the malicious world of criminals, it is almost impossible to turn and become a law-abiding citizen.

Villains are difficult to distinguish from ordinary people and they come from muggers and pickpockets to murderers and terrorists. These people break the law and become outlaws in society for many reasons. Such factors as peer pressure, poor education, drugs, civil unrest and despair may determine criminal behaviour. Arsonists set fire to buildings and destroy property to prove their commitment within gang membership. Vandals damage property intentionally to attract public attention. Bank robbers aim to lead a luxurious lifestyle at the expense of others. Smuggling, burglary and money laundering can be referred to this group. The most dangerous group consists of people who deliberately commit violent crimes. Hijackers or kidnappers illegally seize people by force without permission. They keep victims at gunpoint and threaten to kill them with a gun or another weapon. Criminals often take hostages to an unknown destination. Victims are usually held in captivity for ransom or political causes. Kidnappers may demand other conditions or warn relatives not to involve the police in negotiations. If both sides come to an agreement, captives manage to stay alive and be released in exchange for money.

If the police succeed in catching criminals red-handed, they are arrested and taken to prison. But if criminals escape from the scene of crime and police fail to chase them, it will be difficult to investigate a case. Consequently, police-officers start an investigation, question witnesses or suspect a person of a crime due to lack of alibi. The police make a list of suspects, find evidence to prove the guilt and check fingerprints. Criminals can mislead the police thanks to the red herring. But if proofs are found, criminals are blamed for a crime and punished. They wear handcuffs and wait for a trial in a cell unless they are released on bail. Unfortunately, a prosecutor and jury may find an innocent person guilty and sentence them even to capital punishment. Prisoners may be kept in jail for years and strictly observed by warders or guards.

All participants of justice including private investigators, solicitors and judges try hard to reduce crime. A person who decides to commit a crime should know that it is a road to nowhere.
